DANIEL WEBSTER'S RESIDENCE IN WASHINGTON.

From a letter by N. P. Willis, in the Home Journal, we take the following, suggested by a recent visit of the writer to Washington:

"With a rainy day and no inhabitants, Washington, of course, looked 'as if potatoes had been dug,' but we walked about a little, under an unbrella, and saw the enlargements of the Capital, and stopped for, a few moments before the shut doors of one or two houses made famous by having been once the dwellings of men who were of the 'Sacred Legion of the Someboides'-Benton's and Webster's among others. The latter, a small brick tenement of two stories, near the Capitol, is particularly interesting to those who knew the charm of the great Daniel in familiar lifefor his thoughts were not always 'Shoes for giants in a world of pigmies.' In the small dining room in the basement of that house, and with the simplest of dinners upon the table, there were feasts of wit and humor, at which he shone, (say those who were intimate with him,) even more than in the Senate Chamber, but near by. Here rose Webster an hour before sunrise, every morning of the winter season, and first made all the fires in the house, kitchen, bedroom and parlor-(for it was a thing 'he had a knack at,' and he loved thus to air his drudge-abilities before getting upon his pedestal for the day.)

"Then he took his basket, and walks down to the market, to have a chat with the butcher, and himself to choose the joint and the vegetables for the day's larder-home again before his great eyes were loked for by the curious. And it is of this earthlier Webster, let me say, this noblest of plain merry fellows, in whose mortal body the great inhabiting intellect was a guest, he was often weary of that we want a picture drawn by some friend who thus remembers him. One of the best models of humorous practicability in all literature, I fancy, is a letter of Webster's dated in this very house at Washington and written to the laboring man who was his farm tenant at Marshfield. Judge Warren, of Boston, has possession of it with other specimens of the great statesman's vein of grave drollery and downrightness (a vein of which all mention is strangely omitted in the biographies of him) -- and the Judge, by the way, whom Webster loved so well as the nucleus of the wit and good fellowship of Boston, would be the very man to give us the other picture of his friend—the Marshfield farmer, with Webster shut up in the unseen brainchamber where he lodged."

> SELECTED. HAPPY HOMES.

By all means cultivate them-they are the grand centres and safeguards of the happiest civilizations. Just as man has arisen from savageism, has he prized and exalted home.-The Lares and Penates of his domestic altars, have assumed a divine beauty proportioned to the harmony of his domiciliary abodes. In sad homes, he has been sorrowful; in discordant homes, quarrelsome; in gloomy homes, morose; in vicious, homes wicked and criminal; and only in cheerful, loving unrivalled quality, everywhere acknowledged, of homes happy and Godlike, as becomes the our choice OLD WHISKIES, cannot be equalled homes happy and Godlike, as becomes the full stature of a being created in God's image. We tinker our social and civil institutions at the wrong end-at the top instead of the bottom, where the leaks and flaws really are.—
We hammer away at the community and
State, thinking thereby to rid ourselves of

State, thinking thereby to rid ourselves of homes, and which must be righted there.— which we now adopt; and we deem it a duty to our W. D. Massey, As the home is, so is the community-the As the home is, so is the community—the State. The shapes of public order and morality spring not backward, from the delegaality spring not backward, from the delegated, but forward, from the delegating. As we have more than once said of world-reforming, each man must amend himself and the world-work is done-so let each home become pure, loving and cheerful, and a hale and perfect society and state will be the fruit. Consider the ditty-

"Whatever brawls disturb the street, There should be peace at home."

And if there be peace and its concomitants in all homes, no brawls will disturb the street. The brawlers of the street have brawling spirits at home. We overlook the most vital fact in our survey of the causes of human discord, largely because that fact is reproachful and unpleasant to ourselves. We are troubled with the "beam" in the eye, of which the Master spoke, and which disguises our own faults and exaggerates those of our neighbors. We do not bring the matter home -where it first belongs. If we will do this, we shall set ourselves and our homes right, and our neighbors will have righted themselves by the same rule. By such a heartpurging process we should make the hum-blest homes cheerful, and all homes blooming. Then would it be seen how little all government, save that of self. under the Divine Law of Love, working but Peace and Good Will, has to do with the highest human well being. Blessed Homes! Hearth-sides. where our cradles were rocked, and from whence we shall be borne to our graves let us cultivate cheerfulness therein. At no other shrines wait such ministering angelsno other altars are sanctified by so much holi-

We have seen some beautiful evening costumes, one of which was blue tery velvet: the skirt is without any trimming, but very full; the low necked body is open en point, almost to the waist; it is hollowed out and forms braces, which are fastened on the shoulders; the front piece is composed of a body of plaited muslin, bordered with terry velvet, and they are covered with voluminous white tulle | Benjamin Barton, puffs," say the French Fashions.
